FARM NEWS

By J. A. Smith, County Agent

Virginia farmers have a helping hand when it comes to getting funds for much-needed soil and water conservation practices on their farms.

D. S. Shackleton, Jr., acting administrative officer for the State Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Committee in Richmond, says federal funds totaling $4,340,000 have been allocated to Virginia to assist farmers in conservation activities.

The State Committee made the announcement to cue in with Natural Resource Conservation Week in Virginia, October 14 - 20. Also announced was the fact that the 1957 Agricultural Conservation program handbook for Virginia will be available in county ASC offices during this week.

Shackleton explains that the Agricultural Conservation Program provides for the government to share with the farmers in the cost of conservation farming. The amount of the cost share varies according to the type of practice carried out, but usually amounts to from 50 to 75 per cent of the cost of the practices.

ACP authorized conservation practices include the establishment of a satisfactory enduring type of cover crop on land where needed and the improvement of existing cover. The program also provides for establishing temporary cover where enduring type cover is not practical. Other practices to control the flow of run-off water will offer ACP cost-sharing payments. The program permits ASC county committees to select certain other practices to take care of local or emergency conservation problems.

County ASC committees, meeting with representatives of other agricultural agencies such as Soil Conservation Service, Farmers Home Administration, Extension Service and Forest Service, will select from the state handbook the practices which they consider most needed and applicable to their county. Following this meeting each county ASC committee will either prepare its own county handbook for distribution to farmers or other announcement of such practices.

New hope for gardeners who have been having trouble with fusarium wilt on their tomato crops is seen in the development of a new tomato variety, "Wiltmaster."

The new variety was introduced by researchers at the University of Delaware, who claim it is immune to the common races of the fusarium wilt organism.

The wilt has been widespread on tomato plants in Virginia this year, and even the partially resistant varieties such as Pritchard, Rutgers, and Marglobe, have frequently shown severe damage.

Planting a resistant variety, and rotation of crops so tomatoes are not grown in the same soil year after year, are the recommended control meaures for wilt.

Who are they — these young men you see boring holes in a farm field with an auger, or closely scrutinizing the slope of the land?

Very likely they're soil scientists. The Soil Conservation Service, the U. S. Department of Agriculture, and the VPI Agricultural Experiment Station have been cooperatively engaged for several years now in surveying the soils of Virginia.

R. E. Devereaux, soil scientist at VPI, reports that since 1939, 10 counties, comprising some 2,700,000 acres, have been surveyed. Before that soil surveys had been completed in eight southwest Virginia counties lying within the Tennessee river watershed.

Currently, over-all soil surveys are being conducted in Rapahannock, Northumberland, Lancaster and Montgomery Counties. In addition, soil surveys are being made of individual farms as requested in each of Virginia's 29 Soil Conservation Districts for immediate use in farm planning.

All soil survey work in Virginia is cooperative between the Experiment Station and Soil Conservation Service, and present surveys are made in accordance with the National Cooperative Soil Survey standards. This in part means that soil surveys in Virginia are being made to meet the needs of all users.

What is the purpose? Devereaux explains that you can't buy land wisely, or farm it well, simply by looking at its surface. "We need to find out what the land is like by looking down into the soil itself. We need to know how it lies and what past use has done to it, to know what the land is really like.

"There are many kinds of soil. On some kinds ya can raise almost any crop; on others you will get good yields of some crops and not-so-good yields of others. Part of our land is not suited for row crops of any kind. Part of it is fine for pasture. Much of it will grow trees better than anything else."

F. H. A. GIRLS HAVE GUESTS

Mr. Kenneth Christopher gets a red rose from Jo Ann Beamer.

The Home Economics Cottage was the scene of a gala occasion on October 4. The seventy-nine club members held "Open House" to the teachers, parents and friends of the chapter, Special guests were recognized by having a red rose, the club flower, pinned on them by a member of the club. Many of the guests had not previously visited the cottage, and they were taken on a tour to see the working space and cottage equipment.

The dining room table was beautifully decorated with roses, candles and ivy encircled the punch bowl. The refreshments served were made by the home economics girls at the cottage.

F. H. A. NEWS

The Future Homemakers of A. H. S. met Wednesday, Oct. 10. and enjoyed an inspiring program. Installation of new officers were conducted by Carrie Inge, out-going president.

Rosalie Shelton was elected "Miss F. H. A." of Appomattox Chapter and will compete for the title of "Miss F. H. A." of the Federation in a contest to be held Nov. 17, at Rustburg. An effort is being made to have all local members attend this meeting and support the Appomattox entry.

Appomattox F. H. A. attended the Lynchburg Farm Show in full force. Girls modeling were Jo Ann Beamer, Carole Faye Couch, Virginia Rush, Linda Hunter, Luella Martin, Eloise Rosser, Peggy Williamson and Frances Carson. Carole Faye Couch placed fifth in the best cotton dress made and modeled by the exhibitor. Frances Carson placed first in the best wool suit group made by exhibitor and modeled with accessories. Several prizes were won on canning and baked goods.
